He didn't, however, specifically say anything about the people who actually run the agencies, the bureaucrats whom he would directly appoint in their place. Thus the bevy of new advisers to the Department of Health and Human Services, the Trump administration's main source of federal law, have been largely ignored — at least until now. The Washington Post recently reported that only three of the president-elect's potential picks for positions at the agency have been made public in advance: AD AD Two of the three – Erik D. Prince, the former head of Blackwater, and Tennessee Gov. Bill Haslam – have been quiet for months. But at least Trump has started making waves in the health-care sector with his appointment of Vice President-elect Mike Pence's sister, Diane Haslam, to the board of First Health, a nonprofit health system in Indianapolis. Trump's apparent choice for his first pick to head the agency is Rep. Tom Price (R-Ga.), a former orthopedic surgeon who is now the ranking member of the House Ways and Means Committee. The third person on the staff list is Dr. Andrew Slavitt, a former top health-care official who left the administration after clashing with insurers over the Affordable Care Act's Medicaid expansion. Seeming to confirm the Post's report, Trump's transition team tweeted late last week that "the final list of government officials for the incoming administration is coming together," pointing people to a website called "Records.gov." "We will be making announcements about this over the next few days," the transition team wrote. The ranks of the transition team are notable for more than the departure of John Podesta, whose leaked emails and records revealed he was on the team but was only a "minor player" in the planning of the campaign.
